Draft the opening 90 seconds of a 5-minute stand-up comedy set. My persona is someone who's always slightly overwhelmed by modern life but finds humor in it. Focus on observational humor about technology addiction, specifically how phones are an overwhelming, ever-present force. Include a relatable scenario that highlights this digital dependence. The tone should be wry, a little self-deprecating, and aim for immediate audience recognition and laughter.

Sure! Here's a 90-second opening tailored to your persona—someone charmingly frazzled by modern life, especially technology:

[Walks onstage, squints at audience like the lights are too bright or they might be a notification]
Hey everyone... thanks for coming out. I almost didn't make it—my phone told me I needed screen time before I could leave the house. I don't make decisions anymore—my phone and I are in a co-dependent relationship. It buzzes, I move. It pings, I jump. If it vibrated hard enough, I'd probably do my taxes.
You ever just open your phone to check the time... and then three hours later you're researching whether otters actually hold hands when they sleep?
Yeah, I started looking for the time, and ended up knowing that there's an otter sanctuary in Japan with a livestream and... I think I'm subscribed?
The worst part is—I know the phone is manipulating me. But I'm still like, "Okay, Daddy Algorithm, tell me who I am today." I scroll through Instagram like it's a menu of lives I'm not living. "Ooh, hiking couple with a dog that has its own backpack? Add to cart."
I even tried putting my phone in another room to "be present," you know? Be mindful. But then I sat there for 10 minutes like a nervous parent at a sleepover—"Is it charging okay? Is it making new friends? Did I accidentally leave it on airplane mode like a monster?"

Building on the previous prompt, let's expand the set to include a segment about the awkwardness of 'adulting.' I'm aiming for about 60 seconds on this theme. Here's an example of the kind of humor I'm going for:

Example Joke Idea: 'I tried to do my taxes last week. I felt like I was defusing a bomb, except the bomb was my financial future and the only instruction manual was written in ancient Sumerian. I genuinely considered just sending the IRS a box of glitter and a note saying, "Surprise!"'
Now, create a new joke or short bit about an 'adulting' struggle that captures that same blend of relatable frustration and absurd humor, fitting with the 'overwhelmed but finds humor' persona. It should feel like a natural progression from the technology addiction material.

Absolutely! Here's a 60-second bit on adulting that flows naturally from your tech-overload theme and keeps that same wry, self-deprecating tone:

And it's not just the phone. The older I get, the more I realize being an adult is just... Googling things you should already know. Like last week, I spent 25 minutes trying to figure out if my shower drain is my responsibility... or the apartment's. You ever sit on the floor with wet hair and a plunger like, "Is this a metaphor for something? Am I supposed to learn from this?"
And bills. Bills are like little emotional landmines. They don't even arrive like, "Hey, just a heads up!"—no, they sneak in like, "SURPRISE! You owe money for existing! Hope you enjoyed breathing air last month."
I tried setting up a budget. Honest attempt. Made a spreadsheet, color-coded everything... then immediately bought a $9 smoothie called "Financial Detox." Like somehow the antioxidants would cancel out the overdraft fee.
Being an adult feels like I got handed the user manual to life... but every other page is missing, and the remaining pages are stuck together with mystery g-👇 om the back of the fridge.
